

Failing Students

Allisa Abraham

They are children we cannot teach – statistics that prevent AYP year after year.
No amount of intervention will help.
Been on the path of Does Not Meet Expectations
so long, they never look to land anywhere else.
Accustomed to less than 51percent. That's life on the bubble.

We talk about them as if we know them –
Bless his little heart. No home training to speak of.
That's why he blurts out in class. Doesn't know any better. Won't do any good to write him up – they'll just send him back to class. So we tell them we want to help them be successful – whatever that means.

We give them granola bars and Gatorade – out of our cabinets and desk drawers. Pencil and paper with every assignment. Of course, they aren't prepared. Second chances – retakes galore, a little help after school, that bump from 68 to 70. It's only two points in the scheme of things. We fix it, so they pass, but we never point the way out.

Allisa Abraham is a 10th Grade high school English teacher at Rockdale Career Academy in Conyers, Georgia and a doctoral candidate in the Department of Language and Literacy Education at the University of Georgia. Her poems have been published in NCTE's English Journal. She can be contacted at lisahall@uga.edu