<td>In this talk, April Baker-Bell, Ph.D., will share her journey as a teacher, scholar, and activist to explore how she has used language and literacy research and teaching to work against racial, cultural, and linguistic inequities in communities and classrooms. She will share stories and highlight examples from her personal experiences with injustice and her work with students and teachers to reflect on what has been and what is now in language and literacy education. Baker-Bell will share her framework of Anti-Racist Black Language Pedagogy to reflect on how she's built upon anti-racist theories and successes of the past to push boundaries and reshape what is possible for the present and future. Her talk will emphasize the need for an anti-racist language and literacy education and how theory, research, and practice can operate in tandem with pursuit of justice.</td>

Keynote Speaker: David Stovall

“We Know What to Do, but Will We Do It? Embracing Legacies of Fugitivity in K-20 Education”

Education for Black people in the Western Hemisphere has always been contested. Given the struggle by state and individual actors to prevent Black people—and other people of color—from self-determination, there has always been resistance. Stovall considers these struggles to be fugitive in the sense that they are less concerned with rules and compliance and are centered in the needs of those committed to resist oppression and marginalization. Given that literacy is foundational in this tradition of fugitivity, researchers and scholars need to concern themselves with remaining connected to the historical legacy of resisting White supremacy in education.

12:50-1 p.m.  Closing remarks  Miller Learning Center Room 101

“Theorizing the Reading Brain: An Integrative Approach to Reading and Neuroscience”
Ayan Mitra, University of South Carolina
Lucy K. Spence, University of South Carolina
Catherine Compton-Lilly, University of South Carolina
Mary Guay, University of Georgia

Keywords: Reading, brain, reading theory, reading instruction, neuroimaging

Reading involves a complex orchestration of the semantic, lexical, orthographic, syntactic and phonological processes. We review these components of reading and connect this literature to reading theory. We conclude with a tentative exploration of reading instruction that considers what we know about reading from brain research, cognitive psychology, and educational studies.

Room 267

“Newcomer or Multilingual? Negotiating Linguistic Identities in Student-Led Spaces”
Alexander Feliciano Mejía, Stanford University

Keywords: Linguistic identity, linguistic labels, discourse analysis, ethnography, newcomer students

Recent immigrants are often labeled as newcomers, English learners, and other labels that center their presumed deficits (Mehta 2016; Martínez 2018; Valdés 2017). This session will explore how students provide counter-perspectives to this framing, as evidenced in the findings of an ethnographically oriented analysis of immigrant students engaging in discussion during meetings of a student-led club. We will review unpack the complex work that students engaged in to construe their linguistic personae in the face of deficit labels.

Room 275

“Teachers as Chameleons in Social Justice Teaching”
Charity T. Gordon, Georgia State University

Keywords: Critical literacy, social justice teaching, praxis, English education

Vague conceptualizations of social justice and few examples of social action in schools have attenuated our collective ability to transform oppressive educational systems. This paper provides a spectrum that outlines the foundational tenets of social justice education. Drawing on ethnographic data, the presenter examines how an English teacher vacillated between different colors on this social justice spectrum. This study serves as a model for understanding the factors that cultivate critical awareness and praxis in education.

Room 147

“Asian American Children (Re)negotiate Bicultural Identity in a Chinese Culture Book Club”
Wenyu Guo, University of South Carolina
Yuechen Sun, University of South Carolina

Keywords: Asian critical race theory, literacy, identity, children’s literature

Building on the Asian critical race theory, this one-year qualitative study explores how a teacher includes Asian American histories in a book club and scaffolds Asian American children’s understanding by reading aloud, discussing, and sharing Asian American children’s literature. The study also explores how two Chinese American children (re)negotiate their bicultural identity in the book club.

Room 153

“Doing the Work: Anti-Racist Pedagogy in the Secondary Classroom Using YA Lit”
Kimora Daniel, student, Athens Community Career Academy/Clarke Central High School
Dabria Fleming, student, Athens Community Career Academy/Clarke Central High School
Tanisha Johnson, student, Athens Community Career Academy/Clarke Central High School
Zariah Rocker, student, Athens Community Career Academy/Clarke Central High School
Jennifer Jackson Whitley, teacher, Athens Community Career Academy

Keywords: Anti-racist pedagogy, secondary ELA, culturally responsive pedagogy, workshop, YA literature

This session unpacks the use of anti-racist and culturally responsive pedagogies to address Sims Bishop’s metaphor of books as “windows, mirrors, and sliding glass doors.” In this session, high school students and their ELA teacher will workshop projects they did in response to Dear Martin by Nic Stone and Children of Blood and Bone by Tomi Adeyemi. This hands-on session will offer many take-home ideas for secondary teachers and teacher educators alike.

Room 245
“Storytime for Everyone: Inclusive Literacy Practices in Early Childhood Settings”
Alexandra Lampp Berglund, University of Georgia
Bhairvi M. Trivedi, University of Georgia
Keywords: Early childhood, preschool, children’s literature, (dis)ability
This presentation will explore possibilities for story time practices in inclusive early childhood settings. The audience will have an opportunity to reflect upon interprofessional collaboration, ways to increase students’ understanding of (dis)ability, and means to promote positive peer interactions. The audience will also engage in various activities to promote meaningful story time practices in their own educational contexts.
Room 247

10:30 - 10:50 A.M.

REFRESHMENT BREAK AND POSTER PRESENTATIONS
Room 101

“Critical Literacy in the Elementary Classroom: A Selection of Practices”
Katharine Hull, University of South Florida
Keywords: Critical literacy, classroom practices, elementary
Although literacy teaching can highlight the critical consciousness of learners, elementary teachers are often unsure of how critical literacy can be enacted in the classroom. This poster seeks to illustrate critical language and praxis in the elementary grades, and demonstrate the effectiveness of critical literacy practices when they are implemented. Participants are invited to share their experiences with critical literacy topics and strategies in the classroom.

“Decolonizing Education Through Historical Examination & Interdisciplinary Practice”
Jordan Henley, University of Georgia
Keywords: Science education, decolonizing education, interdisciplinary practice
This session seeks to reexamine the history we know of science and other subjects in an effort to allow minoritized students to recognize the contributions of their culture to the accomplishments in that subject area. The goal of this reexamination is to encourage minority students to feel more connected to the subject areas. Further, this session seeks to explore how interdisciplinary practice can contribute to this practice through collaboration to decolonize education.

“Discovering Critical Literacy: A Journey to Brownness”
Angela Pack, Montclair State University
Keywords: Critical literacy, teacher education
Preparing preservice teachers to teach critical literacy in their classroom requires that the preservice teachers unpacks their relationship with literacy and power. This presentation documents one preservice teacher’s experience in a critical literacy workshop, where she investigated how texts influenced her understanding of self and the world around her. The preservice teacher, redefined herself as Brown, let go on the label Hispanic, and developed a rich understanding of the concept of critical literacy.

“Scaffolding Middle School ESOL Students’ Academic Writing Skills Through Theater Games”
Yixuan Wang, University of Georgia
Keywords: ESOL, art-based approaches, theater games, academic writing
The presenter shares a study that used theater games to improve middle school ESOL students’ academic writing skills and other helpful functions achieved in classes as an art-based approach. The presenter also displays specific theater games and strategies that teachers could further implement in their classes to offer scaffoldings in ESOL classrooms.
BREAKOUT SESSIONS 2

PAPER PRESENTATIONS

“The Importance of Teacher Perspective in the Struggle for Social Justice”
Daniel Stockwell, Clemson University
Elizabeth McDonald, Clemson University
Keywords: Culturally sustaining pedagogy, raciolinguistics, critical language awareness, social justice

Language-minoritized students’ literacy practices are often viewed from a deficit perspective, which causes teachers to overlook the linguistic strengths these students bring to the classroom. Teachers need to adjust their perspectives so they can teach in ways that honor the students’ culture and language practices. During this session, participants will practice culturally sustaining classroom activities based on a raciolinguistic perspective in order to learn practical ways that they can help their students succeed.
Room 267

PROFESSIONAL DEVELOPMENT PRESENTATIONS

“Trigger Warning! Nger as Text/Nga as Speech: Contradiction(s) and the Canon”
Joyce A. Maxwell, Teachers College Columbia University, Union County College
Keywords: Pedagogy, language practice, racialized speech

In the teaching of literature, educators continue to grapple with discussions and usage of nigger/nigga in the American literary canon. While it has become fashionable for students to utter nigga in public spaces on college campuses, its usage and discussion within the academic classroom has ranged from silence, to outrage, to confusion. This session will challenge sensibilities as it pushes educators to think about strategies which promote critical inquiry and intellectual dialogue about this “truly American word.”
Room 275

“Equity in Literacy Coaching: Two Lenses, One Vision”
Mellissa Teston, University of South Florida
Kristin Valle, University of South Florida
Keywords: Literacy coaching, equity, professional development, policy

Pressures for student performance during an era of high accountability often include instructional coaching as a component of support for teachers and a driving force for school reform. When coaches are utilized in a deficit model to “fix” literacy issues, the impact of building capacity of teachers is diminished. These pressures position coaches to prioritize policy implementation instead of supporting teacher goals. This session seeks to explore issues of equity in literacy coaching.
Room 153

“Neurodiversity, Performance, and Identity Construction in Youth Spoken Word”
Anna E. Howard, University of South Carolina
Keywords: Neurodiversity, performance, identity construction in youth spoken word

Today’s schools are striving to provide a greater voice for students who have been underrepresented in the traditional curriculum. This can be a particular challenge when trying to represent and inculcate neurodiverse learners in the traditions of reading, writing, and speaking. Spoken word poetry as a school and community literacy can be an empowering tool for educators that seek to increase inclusivity and support the formation of positive literate identities in their most vulnerable students.
Room 268
ROUNDTABLE SESSIONS

TABLE 1

“Becoming a Producer of Knowledge, not a Consumer: Developing Knowledge-Producing Literacy Skills Amongst Elementary Black Boys”

Tamara Moten, University of Georgia
Keywords: Knowledge producers, Black boys, Black females, literacy lessons

There have been several scholars focused on advancing the reading and writing levels of Black boys. To expand on their studies, how do we keep them there long after elementary school? Investigating how to create producers of knowledge is fundamental in sustaining the reading and writing levels of Black boys. Reflecting on a previous literacy project, I will examine how this project created producers of knowledge.
Room 251

Damaris Dunn, University of Georgia
Keywords: Joy, Black, girls, hip-hop, feminism

This roundtable discussion will use hip-hop feminism to explore Jamila Woods (2016) album, Heavn. The album centers on Black girlhood and joy. Implications for creating space and place for Black girls as well as self-expression are offered for learning spaces in and out of schools.
Room 251

TABLE 2

“Representations of Transgender and Gender Nonconforming Children in Picture Books”

Joshua Hill, University of South Carolina

This critical content analysis of children’s picture books about transgender children illuminates the ways that these texts can highlight the fluidity of gender for children. Drawing from both trans studies and queer theory, this research shows how picture books about transgender can provide ways for transgender, gender nonconforming, and cisgender children to see the multiplicity of gender expression in picture books.
Room 251

“Globalization and the Dynamic Agency of Gay Language Speakers in Indonesia”

Wisnu Agung Pradana, University of Georgia
Keywords: Agency, globalization, queer languages, LGBTQ+

Bahasa Binan is a gay language for Indonesian gay community. This qualitative study aimed to unravel the speakers’ agency in using the language through language and globalization lens. The interview with the participants showed that the settings, the presumed ideology background of interlocutors, and the metalinguistic label of Bahasa Binan influenced the agency of the speakers in using the language. The study also illuminated the extended allies of the community that included their heterosexual comrades.
Room 251

TABLE 3

“Arabic Literature as a Site for Engagement with Alterity”

Ebtissam Oraby, George Washington University
Keywords: Foreign language, literacy, literature, alterity, ethics

This paper reports a classroom ethnography that investigates the reading of Arabic literature in U.S. foreign language collegiate education as a site for engagement with alterity. The study explores how students in foreign language literature courses encounter alterity, how they construct the other and reconstruct themselves as they read modern Arabic literary texts, and how the political, historical, geographical, and cultural contexts in which students read shape their reading.
Room 274

“Reading Assessments in Arabic and English: Insights from Students’ Perspectives”

Ali Alzughaibi, University of South Carolina
Katherine I. Martin, Southern Illinois University
Kamden Summers, Southern Illinois University
Keywords: Reading assessment, Arabic, ESL

Interviews were conducted with 11 Saudi Arabic–English bilinguals regarding their experiences with reading practices and assessments in Arabic and English. Consistent with past work, results show an emphasis on decoding and memorization, and an assessment approach more aligned with content than skills. Limitations and comparisons to best practice are considered.
Room 274
BREAKOUT SESSIONS 2

SATURDAY, 10:55-11:45 A.M.

TABLE 4

Engaging Preservice ELA Teachers in Critical Dialogue with YouTube Remixes

William Wright, University of Georgia
Keywords: Preservice teachers, remix, popular culture, YouTube, critical dialogue

I discuss leading preservice English language arts (ELA) teachers in the creation of video mash-ups that consist of carefully juxtaposed clips from popular YouTube videos in order to elicit critical commentaries about a range of educational issues. I showcase how projects that make use of popular culture and remix literacy (Stedman, 2012) — such as this one — provide innovative entry points to engage preservice teachers in dialogue about critical issues in education.

Room 274

>PICK UP BOOK< Gamifying Literacy through Text-Based Adventure Games

Csaba Osvath, University of South Florida
Keywords: Gaming and play, writing, reading, design-thinking, creativity

Text-based adventure games offer unique opportunities for stimulating critical reading, writing, and problem-solving skills. This presentation advocates for the designing and making of text-based adventure games to strengthen multimodal literacy knowledge and skills.

Room 274

BREAKOUT SESSIONS 3

PAPER PRESENTATIONS

“Review of Translanguaging Practices in ESL Classrooms”

Eun Young Yeom, University of Georgia
Keywords: Translanguaging, ESL, literature review

Translanguaging, in ESL contexts in particular, is still an evolving theoretical concept. And a growing number of empirical studies are added to the fledgling body of literature. With this trend in mind, this presentation will examine the current literature of translanguaging in ESL. This literature review ultimately aims to briefly go through the still-evolving theoretical concept and its empirical implications particularly in ESL classroom contexts from Pre-K to college level.

Room 267

“Furthering Research Through Collaboration: Findings from A Summer Literacy Program”

Sanjuana Rodriguez, Kennesaw State University
Megan Adams, Kennesaw State University
Keywords: Teacher candidates, summer programs, federal work study, literacy

Federal work study (FWS) programs are designed to assist college students from economically marginalized communities in finding work while attending classes (Marzick, 2003). This study describes a summer field experience for teacher candidates entering their final two years of study in elementary education. The candidates are all FWS recipients who are paid during a four-week summer program to tutor children who are economically marginalized and performing below grade level in reading. Details of program funding and opportunities for collaboration will be discussed.

Room 268

“Recreational Reading as a Graduate Student: Escape or Sustenance?”

Gretchen Dodson, University of South Florida
Keywords: Reading attitudes, recreational reading, reading culture

The lives of academics and educators are cognitively demanding and often draining. Though we spend many hours a day involved in academic literacy activities, our personal literate lives are often neglected. In this autoethnographic paper, I explore my personal literate life and the changes it has undergone as a teacher, researcher, and Ph.D. student. I examine the tension between guilt and pleasure, and the privilege inherent in a struggle over when and what to read.

Room 275

“Deficits, Dominance, and the Eradication of Culture: Toward Imaginative, Access-Promoting Pedagogies”

Jenifer Jasinski Schneider, University of South Florida
Patriann Smith, University of South Florida
Meg Jones, University of Rhode Island
Keywords: Digital literacy, digital access, culturally relevant pedagogy

In this theoretical paper, we explore technological illiteracy and digital indifference as prohibitive to culturally responsive pedagogy.

Dismissive attitudes towards gaming, pop culture, and media promote hegemonic practices that contribute to cultural dominance of particular groups over others. We argue that the impact of culturally relevant pedagogy is nullified if educators do not consider what is culturally relevant to students.

Room 153

“School Integration to #BlackLivesMatter: Experiencing History, Teaching about Racism, Building for Justice”

Naitnaphit Limlamai, University of Michigan–Ann Arbor
Keywords: Secondary English language arts, justice, historicizing, anti-racism

English Language Arts has great potential for teaching students for and about justice, yet different understandings of justice can prevent robust exchange of ideas. In this presentation, participants will explore transcripts of how experiencing historical moments can influence discourses of justice in secondary English methods. Surfacing particular historical moments in which preservice teachers and their instructors come to understand justice can help researchers understand what mediates preservice teachers’ uptake of justice in their teaching.

Room 245

“hAPPiness: Choosing Quality Apps that Facilitate Emerging Literacies”

Amy Pulliam, University of Georgia
Keywords: Apps, iPads, emergent literacy, early childhood

We will explore how to choose appropriate apps for early childhood through high school ages using Hillman and Marshall’s (2009) criteria guide for selecting appropriate apps and Israelson’s (2015) App Map. Teachers will get a list of highly-rated classroom apps and a new vision for supplementing current curriculum with rich, digital experiences that will further their students’ thirst for learning and ultimate impact on the world.

Room 247

“Education-ku: Using Theory and Micro poetry to Address and Redress Inequity in Education”

Gliset Colon, SUNY Buffalo State
Jevon Hunter, SUNY Buffalo State
Keywords: Critical race theory, poetry, critique

We will provide a practical example of how teachers can apply critical race theory in the classroom to allow students to critique their educational experiences. Students engage in critical discourse about the challenges they face in their education and use micro poetry as the literary device and platform for expression. It is through this lens that they can provide a critique of education through their lived experiences as young adolescents of color.

Room 253
“What Is Next for Educational Cosmopolitanism?”
Kelli A. Rushek, University of Iowa
Keywords: Educational cosmopolitanism, ELA classrooms, cosmopolitan literacies
Recently there has been a call to reconceptualize educational cosmopolitanism as a framework for educational and literacy research. The cosmopolitan idea has spanned throughout history, resurging when sociopolitical climates are reinvigorated by nationalist and patriotic ideologies. This presentation describes and synthesizes current research on the bridging of educational cosmopolitanism and classroom practice in the ELA classroom, in a seminar discussion style, before using an interactive gallery walk/jigsaw strategy to discuss Scheja’s (2015) tenets of cosmopolitan literacies: dialogicity, reflexivity, criticality, relationality, and historicity.
Room 268

“Literacy in Virtual Reality: Reflections on Immersive Gaming and Storytelling from a Literacy Perspective”
Csaba Osvath, University of South Florida
Keywords: Virtual reality, gaming, multimodal literacy, play, immersive learning
Virtual reality (VR), as a medium for immersive experiences, will continue to impact education and numerous aspects of human existence. It is vital for educators, learners, and scholars to actively engage with this new technology and to participate in the creation, development, and evaluation of VR use in classrooms and beyond. I explore the potentials of VR and how this technology may impact or change literacy education.
Room 153

“Academic Literacy through the Lens of Internationalization and Academic Capitalism”
Andressa Molinari, Londrina State University
Samantha Ramos, Londrina State University
Keywords: Academic capitalism, academic literacy, internationalization
Increasing interconnectedness and global activities have created possibilities of internationalization of education in emerging countries. In Brazil, undergraduate and graduate students have been driven to a series of standardization and examinations concerning their written and oral skills in English. This scenario has created a large demand in the development of preservice teacher education. Thus, this session will seek to present how the internationalization advancement and the challenges in academic literacy has impacted the training of pre-service ESL teachers and its relation to academic capitalism.
Room 267

“Modeling Culturally Sustaining Pedagogy in Teacher Education: A Strategy Showcase”
Tairan Qiu, University of Georgia
Keywords: Teacher education, culturally sustaining pedagogy, writing classroom strategy
Culturally Sustaining Pedagogies (CSP) is a framework for educators to transform their classrooms into generative spaces and focus on issues of diversity, equity, and inclusion. This discussion-based presentation will showcase how CSP was embodied and modeled in a teacher education classroom focusing on writing strategies in the p–5 context. Session attendees will also be engaged in multimodal and multilingual writing and explore how CSP could be modeled in their own classrooms.
Room 245

“Meet the Editors”
Alexandra Lampp Berglund, University of Georgia
Merida Lang, University of Georgia
Keywords: Publishing, academic writing life, JoLLE love
Meet with some of the JoLLE editors to learn about the types of manuscripts we accept, the submission process, and joining the external review board. Discover JoLLE’s different features, including academic book reviews, children’s and young adult literature book reviews, poetry, fiction and visual arts, and scholars speak out. Come and ask questions about JoLLE!
Room 247
PANEL PRESENTATIONS

“Engaging in Critical Content Analysis of Children’s Books to Counter the Curricularization of Racism”

Eliza Braden, University of South Carolina
Roberta Price Gardner, Kennesaw State University
Sanjuana Rodriguez, Kennesaw State University
Natasha Thornton, Kennesaw State University
Kamania Wynter-Hoyte, University of South Carolina

Keywords: Critical analysis, children’s literature, sociopolitical topics, racial literacy

This panel will focus on how literature can be used as a tool for children to address and make sense of layers of privilege and inequity in our society. Panelists will explore critical multicultural picture books that center on diversity and sociopolitical topics related to current events. The participants will examine the texts and reflect on how to engage children in conversations around critical texts and topics.

Room 253

TABLE 1

“Using Narrative and Community-Based Curriculum to Facilitate Agency and Empowerment in Teenage Refugees”

Bridget V. Kearney, University of Louisville

Keywords: Identity, perspectives, TESOL, multicultural education, social context and community, experiential education

The structures of the Western education system can be overwhelming to newcomer refugees. One way to facilitate reconnection with cultural identity, as well as a sense of empowerment, agency and belonging, is through storytelling. This project explores the experiences of refugee youth writing narratives of water insecurity in their native countries. The students’ stories will be published in a book that a community nonprofit, WaterStep, intends to circulate to schools across the district and beyond.

TABLE 2

“Parents’ Perspectives on the Use of Multimedia in Early Childhood Education”

Ling Hao, University of South Carolina

Keywords: Early childhood, language and literacy education, multimedia

With the development of technology, the use of multimedia in education is becoming increasingly popular. While most teachers believe multimedia plays an important role in education, some parents have concerns and prefer not to use multimedia. This creates a gap between teachers and parents. This session will present parents’ perspectives on the use of multimedia in early childhood education and show how teachers could fill the gap.

Room 251

“¿Who soy yo? Positioning and Thickening the Identities of Emerging Spanish Speakers”

Erin Gilreath Carlson, University of South Carolina

Keywords: Identity, bilingualism, adult learners, photovoice

How do honors students in a first-semester university-level Spanish course identify themselves during their semester — as ‘students in a Spanish class’ or as ‘emerging Spanish speakers’? Referencing interviews, students’ written reflections and students’ photographs, this study explores how students transition from positions as non-Spanish speakers into the positionality of Spanish-speakers and if, how, and where that change affects ideas about their identities; three students served as co-researchers in the project, as well.

“Why Wouldn’t We?”: African American Parent Perspectives on Dual Language Immersion”

Sharon M. Nuruddin, University of Georgia

Keywords: Dual language, immersion, African American families, Spanish language acquisition, bilingualism

African American students have long been excluded from dual language immersion (DLI) programs based on racialized, deficit perspectives of second language ability and potential. Since 2014, a Southeastern U.S. county — serving a large population of African American students — has continued to expand its DLI program. The author will present auto/ethnographic and interview research on AA parents of children in DLI and whose perspectives disrupt racist notions concerning African American bilingualism.
PAPER PRESENTATIONS

“The Longitudinal Construction of Inequality in Schools: Micro/Macroaggressions over Time”

Catherine Compton-Lilly, University of South Carolina
Keywords: Microaggression, critical race theory, longitudinal
Catherine Compton-Lilly explores the cumulation of micro/macroaggression through the experiences of her former students as they moved from elementary school to high school. After identifying forms of micro/macroaggression that have been identified in scholarly research, she uses critical race theory to make sense of the micro/macroaggressions reported by the children and families, including a set of particularly disruptive mega-aggressions. This research reveals one way in which inequity is constructed for children in historically underserved communities.

“Blackness is not Monolithic: Black Immigrant Women Scholars Enacting Change through Storytelling?”

Olabisi Adenekan, Judson University
Mellissa Gyimah-Concepcion, Judson University
Keywords: African immigrant, Black feminism, storytelling
Blackness is not monolithic — our identity as Black immigrant women researchers shapes our learning and instruction. Using position theory (Harré, 1998) and Black feminist thought (Collins, 1990), we argue the necessity for Black immigrant researchers to intentionally engage their multiple identities when interacting with students. We eschew concepts of single stories of Blackness and Black womanhood through storytelling, challenging students to think about African diaspora more broadly.

“Embodied Multimodal Curriculum and Design-Based Research in an ESL classroom”

Maverick Zhang, University of Georgia
Ruth Harman, University of Georgia
Sahar Aghasafari, University of Georgia
Melissa B. Delahunty, Cedar Shoals High School
Keywords: Embodied multimodal curriculum, design-based research, immigrant multilingual learners, multimodal composing
The research documents how an ESOL teacher and three university educators, with the help of design-based research, worked collaboratively to develop and implement a two-month embodied multimodal curriculum to support immigrant multilingual learners in multimodal composing. The research was conducted at a public high school in northern Georgia. Data analysis included intertextual exploration and SFL-informed discourse analysis on students’ written and art work, as well as a range of classroom activities.

PROFESSIONAL DEVELOPMENT PRESENTATIONS

“What Can We Do?” School Discipline and Restorative Justice, Institutionally and as a Mindset”

Merida Lang, University of Georgia
Keywords: Restorative justice, discipline, teacher-student relationships
This presentation considers the phenomenon of restorative justice and school discipline, with a specific focus on what individual teachers can do in their classrooms, and whether their school has adopted a restorative justice model or not.
Room 153

“When Life Hands You a Standardized Curriculum, You Make…”

Maria Van Allen, Westridge Middle School
Keywords: Language arts, middle school, standardized curriculum
All you have to do is teach what they give you! Use the resources provided by the district to teach your students. It’s easy! But what happens when the one-size-fits-all district curriculum that you laughed at in college is now what permeates your language arts department? This session will explore the classic saying in education: “when life gives you a standardized curriculum, you connect it to your students and hope to make some lemonade.”
Room 245
“Coding for the Future: Teacher Experiences Merging Computer Science and ELA”

Jessica Eagle, North Carolina State University
Laura Jacobs, North Carolina State University
Katherine Mitchell Smith, J.D. Clement Early College High School

Keywords: CS First, critical digital literacy, critical pedagogy

This session will share why and how two researchers and a high school English teacher worked together to implement computer science in a literature analysis unit. We will engage participants with an interactive look at CS First. CS First provides students of any experience level with coding an opportunity to create and program live-action digital productions to demonstrate their literature learning. We will share lesson materials, content, our challenges and successes, and discuss future possibilities.

“Critical Discourse Analysis of Perspectives on New York City Specialized High Schools’ Admission Reform”

Shuang Fu, University of Georgia

Keywords: Discourse, NYC specialized high schools, Asian American, admission, standardized test

This paper examines a political debate surrounding an educational proposal on the specialized high school admission process in New York City. By applying the methods of critical Discourse Analysis (CDA) and employing Fairclough’s three-dimensional framework (1989), texts are analyzed according to description (text), interpretation (pragmatics), and explanation (the social and cultural context). The analysis reveals the discourses that are taken up by different social actors and demonstrates how these discourses are functioning strategically for varied purposes. In particular, these discourses convey more than what the textualized and verbalized statements show at the surface level, but more importantly, reveal certain ideologies and specific concerns. After the critical examination of texts, it’s found that these discourses, as a dynamic social practice, produce, convey, and diffuse social power, and are closely related to broader social, cultural, and political contexts as well. This paper contributes to our understanding of concerns and challenges for improving equity and diversity in the current U.S. education system, and demonstrates the movements of discourses taken up by different racial and political groups in the broader society.

“Epigenetics: Exploring Transgenerational Effects of Racism on African American Students”

Eli M. Davis, University of South Carolina

Keywords: African American students, healing, enslavement, transgenerational, trauma

African American students are commonly thought to underachieve. To address this issue, educators have developed strategies infusing authentic culture into teaching practices. But, is being culturally relevant enough? This session will push the boundaries of educators to imagine how the biological inheritance of trauma can possibly impact African American students. By contextualizing the African American experience, including the absence of healing from historical subjugation, educators will gain insights on the importance of school environments.

Room 251
“Rupturing Expectations: A Case Study of One Teacher’s Pedagogical Shifts in a 10th Grade ELA Classroom”

Alisha Smith Jean-Denis, UMASS Amherst

Keywords: Contact zones, diasporic encounters, critical pedagogy, ELL learners, racialized texts

Foucault (1970) introduced knowledge as phenomena that can be studied, theorized, and more importantly, ruptured. He emphasized that ruptures are “interruptions” and/or “radical breaks” to prior ways of knowing and being and can always be challenged and departed from. This paper is an examination of one teacher’s ruptures as she seeks to de-center the White gaze in a racialized “American Dream” literary unit with newly arrived youth from the African, Caribbean, and Latin diaspora.

Room 251

“Talking and Teaching in Response to Sexual Assault”

Stacia L. Long, University of Georgia

Keywords: Teacher emotions, teacher identity, literacy curriculum

School communities are, unfortunately, often affected by events like students’ arrests for sexual violence. These incidents circulating in the media and community conversations trouble teachers and students. This session will report how seven teachers talked about and taught in response to the sexual violence perpetrated by a student at their school and provide opportunities to explore how to support teachers and talk with students in the wake of these events.

Room 153

“Literacy Research to Practice and Practice to Research: Continuing the Conversation”

David Reinking, University of Georgia

Jenifer Jasinski Schneider, University of South Florida

Mellissa Alonso, University of South Florida

Keywords: Research and practice, professional development

This session summarizes the key perspectives and conclusions from a two-day forum on literacy Research to practice held after the December, 2019 meeting of the Literacy Research Association. The forum attracted approximately 80 researchers, doctoral students, and practitioners (teachers, administrators, and central office personnel) for an open dialog aimed at (a) determining how literacy research can enlarge its contributions to improving practice, (b) critically assessing existing literacy research in light of what practitioners identify as their and their students’ most pressing needs, and (c) formulating guiding principles and possible actions toward uniting researchers and practitioners as partners in educational endeavors to enhance literacy. Participants in this JoLLE session will react to and extend the forum’s discussion in light of their own views and experiences.

“Enacting a Summer Reading Camp Through the Lens of Positive Youth Development”

Hayley Jordan Hoover, Clemson University

Keywords: Summer reading camp, positive youth development theory, elementary students, striving readers, students with reading difficulties

While research has investigated summer regression, and summer reading programs and incentives are common practices in school districts, researchers have not fully examined summer reading camps (Gerst & Ozier, 2015). This session will discuss positive youth development theory (Benson, Scales, Hamilton, & Seems, Jr., 2006) and how this theory informed the practice of a summer reading camp hosted in a low socioeconomic status school district for students identified as having reading difficulties.

Room 268

“Creatively Responding to Social Justice Texts with Preservice Teachers”

Christine Reilly, Georgia Gwinnett College

Jamie Caudill, Georgia Gwinnett College

Keywords: Social justice, teacher education, reader response

Responding to literature, especially those with themes related to social justice, allows teacher candidates to develop compassion and empathy. With an approach to teaching writing course, we will present responses to social justice themed children’s literature using traditional and technological tools. These creative responses including Twitter chats, mood rocks, cartoon strips, thought clouds, and more will add to the dialogue related to issues elementary students are facing today.

Room 275

PROFESSIONAL DEVELOPMENT PRESENTATIONS

“Voices from the Margin: De/Colonizing the Perception of Dis/Ability in Urban Education”

Nadine C. Duncan, PrOOF Project, Inc.

Keywords: Special education, urban education, economically disadvantaged, learning disabilities, linguistic diversity

The voices of the economically disadvantaged, Black children most commonly affected by the systemic devaluation of Black culture, is often omitted from scholarly discourse. This session will be framed by provocative statements on the state of education made by students who have been labeled as disabled due to their rejection of White, middle class culture. We will open with an interactive activity that will challenge the way we commonly view engagement and ability.

Room 247

“Equity in Literacy: The Coffee and the Coconut Water”

Diana Staffieri Morris, Rowan University

Jennifer Rushton, director of curriculum, instruction and assessment for Greater Egg Harbor Regional High School District

Keywords: Equity, implicit bias, White privilege, brave space, empathy

Equity in instruction is expected. Culturally-relevant teaching is expected. The use of multicultural literature is expected. This session will seek to show educators how to evolve past just having a multiculurally decorated classroom and a diverse classroom library. Teachers will begin to understand that everyone has implicit biases, implicit biases affect instruction, and why it is essential to be aware of our implicit biases.

KEYNOTE SPEAKERS

DR. APRIL BAKER-BELL
Assistant Professor of Language, Literacy and English Education

Dr. April Baker-Bell is Assistant Professor of Language, Literacy, and English Education in the Department of English and African American and African Studies department at Michigan State University. An emerging national and international leader in conversations on Black Language, she investigates the intersections of sociolinguistics, anti-Black racism, and anti-racist pedagogies. As a transdisciplinary teacher-scholar-activist, Baker-Bell draws from and makes contributions to the fields of English Education, Composition-Literacies studies, and Raciolinguistics. The root of her research stems from her experience being ill-prepared to address her Black students’ language and literacy needs when she worked as a high school English teacher in Detroit. As a result, she carved out a research and teaching agenda that creates a pathway to cultural, linguistic, and racial justice for Black students across educational spaces.

Baker-Bell is the recipient of many prestigious awards and fellowships, including Michigan State University’s Innovation & Leadership in Teaching and Learning Award, the 2018 AERA Language and Social Processes Early Career Scholar Award, the Literacy Research Association’s STAR fellowship, and the National Council of Teachers of English (NCTE) Cultivating New Voices Among Scholars of Color (CNV) fellowship. Her award winning research and 16+ years teaching has led to additional honors such as her role as incoming Vice-President elect of the Michigan Council of Teachers of English (MCTE) and summer faculty at the Bread Loaf School of English in Vermont.

Dr. Baker-Bell’s research has recently been published in the English Education journal, the Journal of Literacy Research (JLR), and the Journal of International Review of Qualitative Research. Her first book, Linguistic Justice: Black Language, Literacies, Identity, and Pedagogy, will be published with NCTE–Routledge in February 2020. In addition to her language research, Baker-Bell’s scholarly interests include: anti-racist writing pedagogies, critical media literacies, Black feminist–womanist storytelling, and the health & needs of women of color in academia, with an emphasis on early career Black women.

DAVID STOVALL
Professor of African-American Studies and Criminology, Law and Justice

David Stovall, Ph.D. is Professor of African-American Studies and Criminology, Law & Justice at the University of Illinois at Chicago (UIC). His scholarship investigates three areas 1) Critical Race Theory, 2) the relationship between housing and education, and 3) the intersection of race, place and school. In the attempt to bring theory to action, he works with community organizations and schools to develop curriculum that address issues of equity and justice. His work led him to become a member of the design team for the Greater Lawndale/Little Village School for Social Justice (SOJO), which opened in the Fall of 2005. Furthering his work with communities, students, and teachers, his work manifests itself in his involvement with the Peoples Education Movement, a collection of classroom teachers, community members, students and university professors in Chicago, Los Angeles and the San Francisco Bay Area who engage in collaborative community projects centered in creating relevant curriculum. In addition to his duties and responsibilities as a professor at UIC, he also served as a volunteer social studies teacher at the Greater Lawndale/Little Village School for Social Justice from 2005-2018.
